Not illustrated. 1809 Excerpt: .embrace was ardent, and tender; a short scene of sighs, and tears, and silence, followed;--a fine conflict of our best nature; pregnant with the most pathetick, and beautiful moral sentiments, and imagery; which refused that verbal expression that would have deadened their life, and action. When these agitations of affection subsided; our minds admitted language; descended to the level of calm condolence; and we payed our mutual tribute to the amiable, and pious life; and to the lamented death of my dear father. In this our first conversation, we could not avoid regretting our hard circumstances, and our discouraging prospects; but we mitigated them by a trust in Providence, and by a christian resignation. At this, as at every other trying juncture of my life, I felt a consolation, and a contrast to my sufferings, in my literary pursuits. I recommenced my studies in our humble tenement, with my usual diligence, and ardour; my attention to them was, indeed, sometimes interrupted by convivial meetings with my young companions; and with that indolent, and morally corrupting relaxation, to which bad hours, and too free libations to Bacchus, depress the mind; especially if nature has, in the fine idea, happily framed the constitution, and intended it for nobler exercise. These irregularities, which were too often repeated, gave my tender mother great concern, and made her prognosticate future evils. Her grief, gave me more pain, than my dissipation gave me pleasure; but my high-coloured imagination, the devil that...
