Excerpt: . an angry woman) at my daring to thwart it. I remained firmly on my course, though I was obliged to push up the horse which actually tried of itself to make way. The motor, still shrieking, saw nothing for it but to abandon the heights to me, and endeavoured to pass on the slope. As it did it skidded violently, and after a short interval of upheaval and activity among its occupants subsided into calm and the gutter. An old gentleman with a very red face struggled into view from among many wrappers. I waited till he had finally emerged, and then addressed him impressively and distinctly from the top of the road. Road hog, I said, let this be a lesson to you. I would have said more, he being unable to get away and I holding, so to speak, the key...
